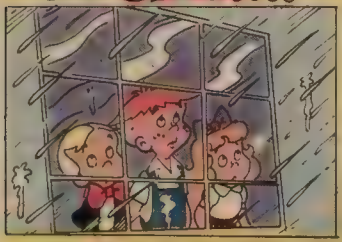
RICHIE RICH in HIDE and SEEK and SEEK...



A rainy day at the Rich Mansion will often produce the same kind of desires that a rainy day will produce in your house. Which sort of explains why Gloria Glad said what she did as she, Richie and their friend Freckles gazed out at the long strips of rainfall that cut across the gigantic mansion windows.

"What a perfect day for a game of hide and seek," she said to her two pals.

"And what a perfect place for a game of hide and seek," Freckles chimed in, looking at the enormous den room they were in and recalling the endless amount of rooms in the Rich Mansion.

"Then let's play," suggested Richie. "It should cheer us up and make us forget this awful rain. Except—"

"Except what, Richie?" the two said together.

"Except we've got to play in just this wing and on just this floor."

"How come?"

"They're painting the rest of the house. It's already taken two hundred men three months"—he really had to chuckle at the thought—"and they're not half-through yet."

(And as it turned out, it was lucky they were still painting!)

Richie, as the host, quickly volunteered to be "it," and a count of a hundred later he was saying: "Here I come ready or not."

He opened his eyes, turned around and saw no one in the room. He had heard some patter of feet while his back was turned, but he couldn't at all tell where they were going. Slowly he moved his way across the room—which as a matter of fact was one of the fourteen dens that were in that wing of the house—and toward the door.

"It doesn't seem as though any of them are still in this room," he told himself . . . when he heard a laugh that someone was trying to stifle. But whoever it was wasn't that successful. It sounded very much like Gloria's and it was coming from the closet nearest the door.

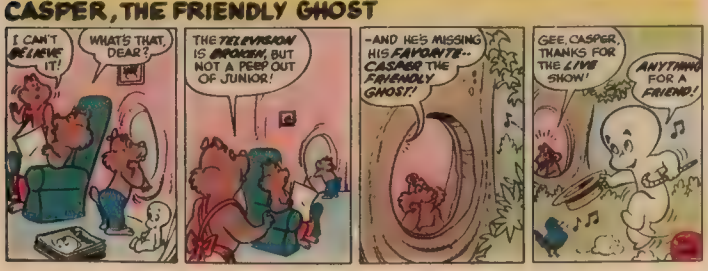
Quietly he approached the closet and then suddenly opened it. Standing in the most remote corner—it must be told that the closet was twenty feet by twenty feet, which is about the size of a normal living room—and now laughing loud and heartily was Gloria.

Richie raced for home base and poor Gloria almost tripping over her own laughter was a far second best. "Tap, tap, you're it," said the winning Richie with a smile.

"I thought you'd never think I'd be this close," said the still laughing Gloria, "but I sometimes laugh at the silliest times."

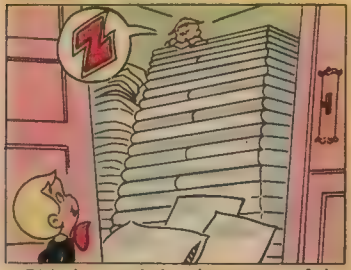
But there was still Freckles to find and that was a different tale.

CASPER, THE FRIENDLY GHOST



"Now if I were Freckles," Richie said aloud, "where would I hide?" His eyes twinkled as he thought it over. "The gym, that's where," he came up with.

There were three gyms on that wing of the mansion and on that floor. But gyms number one, two and three were empty except for a few Scout troops who are given use of the Rich Mansion for their weekly meetings.



Richie's second thought was one of the library rooms. There are four—no, five—libraries in that part of the house and all that he found in any of those was more than a million books and some local scholars who are allowed to use the fine facilities of the Rich Mansion Library System.

Each of the kitchens produced only an incredible amount of food, the TV rooms nothing but the finest collection of TV sets in the world, the indoor pools nothing but some people from town who are given free swimming lessons, the parlors nothing but ladies from one or another of Mrs. Rich's clubs—but nowhere in any of the many, many rooms Richie and Gloria looked into was there Freckles!

"Gloria," said Richie finally, "I'm getting scared. You know he might have gotten lost in the house."

"Oh, my, yes," agreed a frightened Gloria. "It's—gulp—lucky that the rest of your house is shut off by the painters."

"You could say that again. There have been people lost in the house for fifteen or more years."

They were going back slowly to the den room now, gazing once again into each room they passed along the way, and wondering what next they could do.

"Zzzzzzzz," they suddenly heard.

It was coming from one of the linen closets along the hallway.

"I never knew sheets and pillowcases sleep," said Gloria, "not even Rich pillowcases and sheets."

"Do you think . . . ? Richie said, almost afraid to complete his question.

"I don't know, Richie, but I sure hope so."

They slowly opened the door, and on top of close to fifty thousand sets of the world's most expensive linen was a sleeping Freckles!

"Tap, tap you're 'it' !" Richie yelped with glee.

"Huh? Is it time to get up for school, Ma?" answered a startled Freckles.

And when they told Freckles what happened they all started to laugh. But then like a streaking rabbit, Freckles suddenly dashed away toward the den room they had started in.

"Home free," he yelled as he reached it. Then talking loudly to Richie, he said: "You forgot to tap home base, Richie. So you're still 'it.' "

And you know what? He was right.
